It is really unfortunate that the government once again feels the need to extend its tentacles into an emerging industry with tremendous growth potential. The NAB has underserved its constituency for decades by failing to innovate. Now that a competitor is entering the market with superior programming, the NAB feels they can use the government as its henchman to stifle innovation rather than making improvements to itself. The NAB has missed its opportunity to innovate and we should not be made to suffer from its lack of innovation. We've been doing that for the past 20 years before satellite radio.
